RAILROADERS IN WASHINGTON TO TRY FIND BASIS OF STRIKE SETTLEMENT

STRIKE CONFERENCE IN WASHINGTON - UPPER RAILROAD REPRESENTATIVES - LOWER, UNION LEADERS

Done with friendly advice and suggestions after repeated appeals to the railroads of the United States and the four railway brotherhoods to make peace and avert a national strike. President Wilson framed a basis of settlement which he prepared to submit to both sides with the notification that he was ready to go to congress, if need be, to prevent the strike. The president's peace plan is a compromise, providing: First.—That the railroads grant the eight hour day. Second.—That the workers give up their demand for time and a half pay for overtime work. While the president did not tell how he might ask congress to act, the supposition as to his most probable action, if it appeared finally that there could be no voluntary agreement upon arbitration, would be to advocate a compulsory act. Such a law exists in several forms in European countries, and the passage of an act similar to the compulsory arbitration law of Australia was strongly advocated in Washington at the time of the enactment of the Newlands isw in 1913, under which was created the United States board of mediation and conciliation, the powers of which are limited to those of persuasion.
